

DAY 3

9.00am. Day 3 of the seeds new life and everything is progressing as expected. No hiccups, no disasters and no needs!

No hordes of angry birds or any whatthamightallemms have swooped down and devoured the seeds.

No monsoonal rainfall has blighted my crop washing soil and seed away.

No, there hasn't been any cataclysmic environmental disaster that destroyed my crops.

Not yet anyway!

And that is very much to be expected.

As, after all, these seeds have been planted, just 3 days ago I must remind you all, in pots on my balcony in my small flat on the outskirts of Mosta, Malta.

Malta being a mediterranean country of temperate and generally mild weather which rarely sees extreme meteorological occurrences.

The environmental disasters seen here are all predominantly man made.

Destruction of arable and fertile land, uprooting of decades old, if not older, trees all to be replaced, we are told, by expensive to install and expensive to keep green walls.

The hypocrisy is weeping.

Ah, I digress.. back to my seeds.

So no movement yet, expected. No disaster, environmental or otherwise yet, expected.

Nothing but 9 pots of soil on my balcony. All 9 in the same state that they were 2 days ago. Again to be expected.

I also expect that this standoff, if you wish, will continue for another 15 days or so.

Yet I still wanted to share the life of my seeds with you all.

These seeds being as follows

Nasturtium in the first two pots
Chives in the three small pots next to the Nasturtium pots.

And finally in the last four pots are Cornflower, Borago and Marigold.

Looking forward to seeing them germinate!
